What was it like?: L'lien Rainforest was deep, unmapped, and lush land. It was the hottest, most humid and rainy area on the continent. Dense forest in the north, with estuary mangrove swamps to the south.

- Nearly every culture has their own name for the Rainforest, but many people were taught the common name, L'lien, in schools. This area was steeped in mystery, lore, and magic.

- Immediately after the chain of lakes in the north, the tree line towered above as an impenetrable green wall. The Rainforest radiated life energy, but was eerily silent when standing at the northern border. Even Wylde Elf activity seemed nonexistent.
- The L'lien Marshes spread for miles, with crisscrossing watery pathways that seem to change behind you. It was generally believed that the entire southern half of the Rainforest floated on the water, due to the density of marshgrasses and estuarine trees and vines. Dangerous beasts were also believed to live underneath the lush mats of vegetation, eager for snacks.
- Many sick or dying individuals would come to the edge of the forest for complex healing rituals, believing that the huge radiation of living energy will augment their magic. The journey to this area was long and treacherous, and nearly impossible by boat.
- Many reagents and artifacts sold on the black magic market were claimed to have been obtained from ancient sites deep within the Rainforest.

Did you Know?: There were thought to be Halflings living here, as rumors of a Bellena tree grove have existed for centuries, but no one was able to officially show evidence of either.
